CITY IS BRIGHTER

Washington is Proud Capitol of Country.

WAS ONCE JOKE OF FOREIGNERS

Once Called A "Mud Hole," the Federal City is Now Becoming One of the World's Finest Capitals—Splendid Architectural Projects To Be Carried Out.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 31, 1907.—They used to call it the "mud hole." Traveled Americans were highly ashamed of its unkempt squalor. A feeble apology for a national capital, it made, during the years before the Civil War, a most unfavorable impression upon visiting foreigners. The French writer De Baucourt described it in 1840 as "neither a city nor a village nor a country place but just a building yard in a desolate spot where life is unbearable." Even the original land of the city, due primarily to the practical genius of two men, President George Washington and Major Charles L'Enfant, had been almost hopelessly botched. Railroad tracks had been allowed to run right across the great Mall which was intended to connect the Capitol and White House with the Washington Monument on the intersection of the axes of the two buildings. In many other respects anarchy had been allowed to prevail in place of contemplated order.

All that, of course, was before the days when "Boss" Shepard pulled Washington out of its slough, paved its streets with asphalt, and made at least a good-looking second-class American city of it. Now, each autumn as Washingtonians return from the long vacation which the summer heat of the capital city prescribes, they discover that great progress has been made on large architectural projects which are going to make the city one of the most beautiful in either hemisphere. The summer of 1907 has been no exception. Work has been pushed the last few months on the group of handsome buildings on Capitol Hill. On the shore sides of the rectangle of open space whose long sides are occupied by the Capitol and Library of Congress, the white marble office buildings designed for the Senators and Representatives, respectively, are approaching completion. It is generally conceded that they look extraordinarily well, and it is certain that they will add greatly to the facilities for transacting the nation's business.

Just below the hill to the northeast the Union Station emerging from its array of scaffolding has demonstrated to Washingtonians that with its fine semi-circular approach it is to be one of the most striking railroad stations in the United States. As soon as it is occupied, a few months hence, the old Sixth Street Station will be removed and the tracks of the Pennsylvania railroad will be taken from the Mall, thus completing one very important part of the Park Commissioners' agitation for a restoration of George Washington's original plans.

There has also been marked progress on the new structures bordering on the Mall to be occupied by the Department of Agriculture and the National Museum. Both these should be occupied within a couple of years. The very handsome municipal building of the District of Columbia will probably be dedicated early in 1908. Activities on the Connecticut Avenue Bridge, the largest concrete arched structure in the world, have been watched with great interest by stay-at-home Washingtonians. These operations and many more like them, as everyone is aware who has noted the growth of Washington in the past few years, are only a beginning. Almost countless improvement and building projects have been set afoot by public and private initiative. Apartment hotels and office buildings continue to rise in every direction. The International Bureau of American Republics is shortly to have a magnificent home, the funds for which were given by Andrew Carnegie, on the site of the historic Van Ness mansion facing the Washington monument of the northwestern end of the Mall. This site is one which was purchased by George Washington University some years ago, but which, on account of a feeling that it was not extensive enough for the uses of an institution whose rapid growth in numbers and prestige has assured it a high standing as a national university, was advantageously resold, the proceeds to be applied toward the purchase of another site. The new headquarters of the Bureau of American Republics will be an imposing addition to the architectural array in the neighborhood of the White House. Again, in the now fashionable residential quarter about Cathedral Heights, Bishop Satterlee's big church, upon designs by a firm of English architects, is to introduce a mediaeval note into the prevailing classical architecture of the capital. If the Presbyterian also have a cathedral, as has been proposed, Washington will be plentifully supplied with places of worship surpassing those of ordinary interest.

The architectural character of the new buildings of the George Washington University cannot be predicted as yet, although plans were drawn at the time it was proposed to relocate the University on the Van Ness site, and these may contain suggestions that will be used later on. In order to secure funds for purchasing an absolutely adequate tract of land somewhere within the city limits near enough to the governmental departments, libraries and museums, so that these may still as now serve as working laboratories for teachers and students, a campaign was conducted last spring in the interest of the University's building fund. It will doubtless be renewed and enlarged in scope this fall. The intention has been that citizens of Washington shall show their interest by providing the land, while a more general appeal is made to the whole country for endowment of the necessary buildings.

To have such a well equipped university in the city will accord with George Washington's original scheme of a national capital. The university idea was one which he held in common with several others of the fathers of the Constitution. At the first constitutional convention in 1787 it was proposed to include in the constitution a clause empowering Congress to establish a university in which no preference or distinction should be allowed on account of religion. The proposal was defeated but Washington's enthusiasm continued, as was shown by the endowment which he bequeathed to found such a university—or securities, as it unluckily turned out, that had little or no cash value.

To the end of his life Washington was deeply interested in the university as a logical part of the big idea he had for a capital of the whole Union. Hon. H. B. F. Macfarland, president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia and one of the strongest advocates of the claims of Washington as the intellectual and educational centre of the country, has lately described in an article in the Chautauquan the brooding fondness with which the great Virginian worked over the plans for the city that was to bear his name; how he conferred over every little detail with L'Enfant and Elliott; how he acquired more than half the land of the future city free of cost to the government on the argument to the original proprietors that what they kept would be greatly enhanced in value; how he secured loans from the states of Maryland and Virginia to help out in the erection of the Capitol, the White House and other governmental buildings. He seems to have had in mind a university which Congress should help support. The day when such an institution would be desirable in Washington has passed. The present idea is to accept no governmental gratuities. But for the rest a well housed university is a logical part of the Washington idea.

Mr. Macfarland voices the sentiment of all good Washingtonians in urging that while the residents of the city are willing and anxious to do all in their power—theirs is not a rich city—to carry out the plans which the Father of his Country first laid down, they need outside assistance. "We of Washington," he says, "claim and expect the constant sympathy and support of all patriotic Americans in all the efforts for the upbuilding and embellishment of the city which is as much their capital as ours. As it is under the legislative control of Congress which now, because it is the National Capital and because the National Government owns more than half the real estate of the city of Washington, contributes one-half of the municipal expenditures, it looks to the intelligent constituents of Congress to assure their Senators and Representatives that they will support every just and reasonable measure for the improvement of conditions, physical and moral, in the Federal City."
